SECTION 4.READING*Task 1. Read the article and then answer the questions below.*/6x1=6 points/*The Internet in a cup

Where do you go when you want to know the latest business news or keep up with the latest scientific and technological developments? Today the answer is obvious: log on to the Internet. Three hundred years ago, the answer was just as easy. You went to a coffee shop, or coffee house as it was called then. Collectively, Europe's interconnected web of coffee houses formed the Internet of the seventeenth century.

Like today's websites, coffee houses were lively and often unreliable sources of information. News and gossip were regularly passed between them and runners would go around reporting major events such as the outbreak of a war or the death of a head of state. Coffee houses were also popular places to have political discussions, which is why King Charles II tried, unsuccessfully, to have London's coffee houses closed down in 1675.

In the days before street numbering or regular postal services it became common practice to use a London coffee house as a postal address and regular customers would pop in to see if there was any post for them while they were checking up on the latest news. That said, most people frequented several coffee houses, as different locations attracted different people: Will's in Covent Garden was a popular venue for writers, the Westminster coffee houses attracted the politicians, businessmen went to the Royal Exchange and financiers to Lloyd's.

The drink that fuelled this network originated in Ethiopia, where the beans used to be chewed, rather than drunk. The first coffee house opened in 1475 in Istanbul, Turkey, a place where coffee was so important that it was legal for a woman to divorce her husband if he could not supply her with enough of the drink. A hundred years later, a coffee house was opened in Vienna and they spread quickly through Europe. The popularity of coffee owed much to the growing middle class, who preferred coffee to alcohol because they believed it stimulated mental activity.

Can the Internet claim to have had as much impact as the coffee houses? Perhaps. What is interesting, though, is how modern coffee shops, different from the old ones in so many other ways, now provide Internet access, so that people can sip their cappuccinos and find out the news of the day, just as they used to.

39. What does the article suggest about the reliability of information shared in coffee houses?

- A. It was generally unreliable and often based on gossip.
- B. It was always reliable and accurate.
- C. It was verified by government officials.
- D. It was more reliable than today's internet information.
- E. It was only about political matters.

40. What is the author's main purpose for the title "The Internet in a cup"?

- A. Early coffee houses were used as post offices.
- B. Nowadays you can log on to the Internet in a coffee shop.
- C. Coffee shops in the past used to have the same function as the Internet today.
- D. Most people visited several coffee houses due to a number of different customers.
- E. The Internet has less impact than the coffee houses nowadays.

41. What can be inferred about the role of coffee houses in political discussions?
- They were ignored by politicians.
 - They were vital for political discourse.
 - They were banned because of unreliable information.
 - They were used exclusively by writers and artists.
 - They were dangerous places to discuss politics.
42. What specific function did London's coffee houses serve?
- They were the only places where coffee was sold.
 - They were places where people could rent rooms.
 - They were solely for political meetings.
 - They were used as postal addresses by regular customers.
 - They served as offices for government officials.
43. What is the primary comparison made in the article?
- The comparison between coffee and tea consumption.
 - The comparison between internet coffees and postal services.
 - The comparison between London and Turkish coffee houses.
 - Comparing political discussions in coffee houses and government offices.
 - Comparing modern coffee shops and seventeenth-century coffee houses.
44. What does the article imply about the spread of coffee houses in Europe?
- They spread throughout Europe after their introduction.
 - Popularity of coffee houses was unnoticed in Europe.
 - Coffee houses were only popular among the lower class.
 - Coffee houses were not popular in Europe.
 - Coffee houses only spread in Eastern Europe.

Task 2. Read again and complete this summary of the article with the following words.

There are two extra.

/3x3=9 points/

- A. because B. whereas C. although D. as E. throughout
